When I left father s house, had any one predicted I would become the thing I am, I would have pronounced such prophet crazy. At that time my only thought was to earn a decent support by honest labour. You know, Hester, I was neither lazy or luxurious. I found work in a distant village in a minister s house. I had met this minister when at my aunt s going to school. He evinced much interest in my studies, and in other respects manifested much kindness. He was the first person in the world who discovered anything in me worthy of interest, worthy of commendation. My first feeling toward him was heart-felt gratitude. If you remember, Hester, father never praised, he always found fault, he disparaged every effort we might make, whatever the direction. I had grown...
