It may be argued on the other hand that the barracks and docks and other buildings and plant thus paid for out of capital last for many years, and that therefore it is more reasonable to spread the cost over a considerable period instead of charging it all to one year. This would be a very good reason if these works were of an altogether exceptional character. But as a matter of fact the British Government has always to be building docks and barracks; it has always to be laying fresh telegraph wires, to be enlarging post offices, law courts, and prisons. If the Government were run as a commercial concern all these forms of outlay would properly be treated as capital expenditure, and charged to capital account, and would gradually be written off by successive depreciations. It is, however, impossible to...
