Excerpt: . . . himself to be about midway between the two shores. The height and length of the seas aided this impression; and it must be added that Cap by this time began to feel a respect for fresh water which twenty-four hours earlier he would have derided as impossible. Just as the night turned, the fury of the wind became so great that he found it impossible to bear up against it, the water falling on the deck of the little craft in such masses as to cause it to poake to the centre, and, though a vessel of singularly liv. V qualities, to threaten to bury it beneath its weight. Thh people of the Scud averred that never before had they beev out in such a tempest, which was true; for, possessing a perfect knowledge of all the rivers and headlands and nans, Jasper would have carried the cutter in shore long er-. this, and placed her in safety in some secure anchorage. But Cap still disdained to consult the young master, who below, determining to act like a mariner of the broad ocean. It was one in the morning when the storm-staysail was again got on the Scud, the head of the mainsail lowered, and the cutter put before the wind. Although the canvas now exposed was merely a rag in surface, the little craft nobly justified the use of the name she bore. For eight hours did she scud in truth;...
